

having resolved to convoke a new Chamber of Deputies, I was appointed President of the Electoral College of the Department of the Yonne. As soon as I was informed of my nomination I waited on M. de Talleyrand for my instructions, but he told me that, in conformity with the King's intentions, I was to receive my orders from the Minister of Police. I observed to M. de Talleyrand that I must decline seeing Fouche, on account of the situation in which we stood with reference to each other. "Go to him, go to him," said M. de Talleyrand, "and be assured Fouche will say to you nothing on the subject."

I felt great repugnance to ~~sim~~* Pouche, and consequently I went to him quite against my inclination. I naturally expected a very cold reception. What had passed between us rendered our interview extremely delicate*. I waited on Fouche at nine in the morning, and found him alone, and walking in his garden. He received me as a man might be expected to receive an intimate* friend whom he had not seen for a long time. On reflection I was not very much surprised at this, for I was well aware that Fouche could make his hatred yield to calculation. He said not a word about his arrest, and it may well be supposed that I did not succeed to turn the conversation on that subject. I asked him whether he* had any information to give me* respecting the elections of the Yonne. "None, at all," said he; "get yourself nominated if you can, only use your endeavors to exclude General Desfournaux. Anything else is a matter of indifference to me."—"What is your objection to Desfournaux ?" — "The Ministry will not have him."

I was about to depart when Fouche called me back saying, "Why are you in such haste ? Cannot you stay a few minutes longer ?" He then began to speak of the first return of the Bourbons, and asked me how I could so easily bring myself to act in their favor. He then entered into details respecting the Royal Family which I conceive it to be my duty to pass over in silence. It may be added, however, that the conversation lasted a long time, and to say the least of it, was by no means in favor of "divine right."

I conceived it my duty to make the King acquainted with this conversation, and as there was now no Comte de Blacapo